

Everyone has been faced with the same harrowing decision when stuck in an airport: what in the hell am I going to eat and drink now? So, in an effort to help you best sort that out, allow us to present our ranking of every single meaningful American airport's food and drink.

We did it like this: first we broke down every essential airport by the number of planes that fly in, plus region so every state was included. Then we looked up every single restaurant and bar available at each spot, and broke the airports down into four tiers. Once we had the tiers, we went deeper and figured out our proper rankings, paying particular attention to two factors: a) whether the options were unique and illustrative of the foods of that region, and b) the quantity of quality places available. But we tried to weigh the first factor higher, so smaller airports with more local food got more credit than massive places with 85 chains.

Like any piece on the Internet ever, we assume there will be some disagreements, so please illuminate us in the comments. But until then, start booking some flights, and get hungry:

10. Hartsfield-Jackson Atlanta

Atlanta, GA

ATL could've just populated their airport with 97 Chick-fil-As that are open on Sundays and maybe a few self-serve Coca-Cola stations like in the basement of the World of Coca-Cola museum, but they went SO MUCH FURTHER with Southern/Asian One Flew South, which might actually be one of the best restaurants in the whole city, an Ecco outpost, an airport rendition of 60+ year-old soul spot Paschal's, LowCountry, and, well, a few Chick-fil-As that are not open on Sunday.
